QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY
BELFAST

Selective Justice and Constructions of Victimhood at the Khmer Rouge Tribunal

Killean, R. (2018). Selective Justice and Constructions of Victimhood at the Khmer Rouge Tribunal. In Transitional and Transformative Justice: Critical and International Perspectives Routledge.

Published in:
Transitional and Transformative Justice

Document Version:
Peer reviewed version

Queen's University Belfast - Research Portal:
Link to publication record in Queen's University Belfast Research Portal

Publisher rights
Copyright 2018 Routledge. This work is made available online in accordance with the publisher's policies. Please refer to any applicable terms of use of the publisher.

General rights
Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Queen's University Belfast Research Portal is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy
The Research Portal is Queen's institutional repository that provides access to Queen's research output. Every effort has been made to ensure that content in the Research Portal does not infringe any person's rights, or applicable UK laws. If you discover content in the Research Portal that you believe breaches copyright or violates any law, please contact openaccess@qub.ac.uk.

Selective Justice and Constructions of Victimhood at the Khmer Rouge Tribunal

Dr Rachel Killean

1. Introduction.

Since World War Two highlighted the grave harm so frequently inflicted on civilians during times of conflict, there has been a growing willingness to prosecute atrocities under international criminal law (ICL). This has been reflected in the proliferation of ICL mechanisms, including ad hoc Tribunals, hybrid institutions and the permanent International Criminal Court (ICC). Such institutions have often been analysed for their ability to bring ‘justice’ to victims, and an ever-growing literature has developed in relation to victim-related issues, including reparations (Moffett, 2017; McCarthy, 2012), complex political victims (e.g. Bernath, 2015; Meyers, 2011), the role of the victim within the courtroom (Trumbull, 2008; McGonigle Leyh, 2011), and victims’ perceptions of justice (Stover, 2005; Hodžić, 2010). Parallel developments in victim-centric discourse and practice can be seen within ICL institutions. Victims have become a progressively central figure in courts’ legitimising practices,¹ while the inclusion of victim participation provisions in several courts have been heralded as signalling a move towards a more ‘victim-orientated justice’ (Vasiliev, 2009). Such developments have been accompanied by increased recognition within international human rights law of victims as holders of rights, including the rights to protection, participation, representation and reparation.²

Despite this nominal move towards ‘victim-centrism’, the extent to which victims are rendered visible within these processes remains contested (McEvoy and McConnachie 2013; Kendall and Nouwen, 2013; Fletcher, 2015), and courts have found their ability to deliver justice subjected to criticism from victimised populations (Kutnjak Ivković and Hagan, 2011; Killean, 2016). This disjuncture between victim discourse and the delivery of ‘justice’ can in part be attributed to the selective delivery of justice offered by legal institutions (Robins, 2017: 45). Only a small number of atrocities fall within the scope of ICL, and of those only some will be acknowledged as such by the international community (Cryer, 2005; Simpson, 1997). Even those victims whose atrocities fall within ICL may be excluded from recognition and redress (Robins, 2017), as prosecutorial strategies prioritise specific harms and perpetrators over others (Pritchett, 2008; Côte, 2005). These institutional choices create what Kendall and Nouwen (2013) have termed a 'pyramid' of victimhood, with victims of harm at the bottom, and those recognised by ICL institutions as worthy of redress at the top.

¹ See e.g. International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, First Annual Report to the UN General Assembly, a/50/365-s/1995/728, 1995, paras. 1 and 198–199; International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, Third Annual Report to the UN General Assembly a/53/429-s/1998/857, 1998, para. 160.

² See e.g. UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, UNGA Res. 40/34, 29 November 1985; UNOHCHR, The Right to Restitution, Compensation and Rehabilitation for Victims of Gross Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Final Report of the Special Rapporteur, Mr M.Ch Bassiouni, UN Doc. E/CN.4/2000/62, 5 March 1993; UNOHCHR, Updated Set of Principles for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights through Action to Combat Impunity, UN Doc. E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1, 18 February 2005; UN Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, UNGA Res. 60/147, 16 December 2005.

This paper situates these institutional choices, the pyramid of victimhood they create and the selective justice they shape within broader criminological and victimological debates, drawing from critical victimology in particular. Rising out of a desire to critique definitions of symbolic or 'ideal' victims and perpetrators (Christie, 1986: 18), this branch of victimology is concerned with who has the power to apply the label 'victim' and what considerations influence that determination (Miers, 1989; Mawby and Walklate, 1994). Highlighting 'hierarchies of victimhood' (Carrabine et al., 2004: 117), which distinguish between those victims who are 'innocent' (McEvoy and McConnachie, 2012: 531-2) 'good'; (Madlingozi, 2007) or 'worthy' (Tilly, 2008) and those that are not, victimologists have demonstrated that who acquires the label of victim depends not only on the victims' characteristics, but on the reactions of others (McAlinden, 2014). Thus, there is a political dimension to the hierarchy of victim legitimacy, with the very term 'victim' being open to manipulation by political and legal elites in the pursuit of other goals (Dignan, 2005; Walklate, 2011: 189). In response, critical victimologists have sought to uncover victimizations that may be rendered invisible due to the political climate, social factors, or the marginalised status of the victims (Holstein and Miller, 1990; McGarry and Walklate, 2015).

Although critical victimology developed in the context of Western domestic criminal justice, in recent years it has provided a framework for exploring the role of states in perpetrating crime (Kauzlarich, Matthews and Miller, 2001) international responses to atrocity (Letschert et al. 2011) and the emergence of victim hierarchies within transitional justice contexts (van Wijk, 2013; McEvoy and McConnachie, 2013). International criminal courts are increasingly acknowledged as having the power to produce and legitimise categories of victims, condemn perpetrators and shape understandings of conflicts (Mibenge, 2013). While the creation of such narratives is nominally based on issues of fact and law, hegemonic power relations contribute to the collation and interpretation of those issues (Mibenge, 2013: 4). Legal professionals, victor governments, other states, international organisations and donors all take part in the negotiating of law and fact, thus shaping which victims are legitimised within justice processes.

While the literature has acknowledged the political and legal construction of victimhood within both domestic and transitional contexts, the precise processes through which some victims are selected as worthy of recognition and redress is a relatively neglected dimension within current discourse. This paper seeks to address this gap, providing a ‘thicker’ understanding of victim visibility within ICL (Geertz, 1993; McEvoy, 2007) by exploring a) how victim recognition is shaped by the specific political context within which a court operates, and b) how victimhood continues to be ‘produced, perceived and interpreted’ by the various actors engaged in the work of the court (Geertz, 1993: 7). This actor-oriented approach allows for an exploration of the different stakeholders within ICL, their heterogeneous interests, and their influence over responses to victimisation. Institutions cannot think for themselves, but are shaped by the approaches of those engaged in their work (Douglas, 1987). Indeed, the new, evolving and often ad hoc nature of ICL grants its practitioners an influence beyond what would be found within domestic jurisdictions. Thus, an analysis of how the pyramid of victimhood has been shaped by various actors can highlight law ‘as a dynamic and, in some ways, even contingent process’ (Palmer, 2015:15). As will be explored through this paper, what is revealed through this analysis is a ‘layered’ process of victim selectivity, as political actors, lawyers, judges and civil society actors have constructed and interpreted responses to mass victimisation.

To conduct this analysis, this paper focuses on the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, or ‘Khmer Rouge Tribunal’ (KRT) as a case study. The Khmer Rouge Tribunal is a hybrid court (Raub, 2008-2009) established through an Agreement between the UN and the Royal Government of Cambodia (RGC) to prosecute atrocities perpetrated during the Khmer Rouge regime (1975-1979). To date, two cases have been tried at the KRT. Case 001 concerned the former chairman of the S-21 detention centre, KANG Guek Eav, who was sentenced to life imprisonment in 2012.³ Case 002 relates to crimes ranging across Cambodia, and the original accused were four former high ranking Khmer Rouge: NUON Chea, KHIEU Samphan, IENG Sary, and IENG Thirith. However, IENG Thirith was found unfit to stand trial in 2011, and the case was terminated against both her and IENG Sary following their deaths in 2015 and 2013 respectively.⁴ Due to fears about trial management and the advanced age of the remaining defendants, Case 002 was split into a series of sub-trials. The first concluded in 2016, finding the accused guilty of crimes against humanity,⁵ and a judgment in the second is expected in 2018.

³ Case 001, Appeal Judgement, 001/18-07-2007-KRT/SC, 3 February 2012.

⁴ Case 002, Decision on IENG Thirith's Fitness to Stand Trial, 002/19-09-2007/KRT/TC, 17 November 2011; Case 002, Termination of the Proceedings Against the Accused IENG Sary, KRT Trial Chamber, 002/19-09-

The KRT is expected to deliver somewhat broader social goals than are usually expected of a court. There is a high expectation that it will contribute to ‘national reconciliation, stability, peace and security’,⁶ and the Court is therefore expected to be ‘closer to the victims and the general population in Cambodia’ (Zhang, 2016: 521). Yet, despite these expectations of long-term and general benefit, institutional choices with regards to jurisdictional limits, charges, and access to victim participation have inevitably produced Kendall and Nouwen’s pyramid of victimhood, acknowledging, but also excluding a range of victimisations.

This paper proceeds as follows. Section two explores the role of political and legal elites in framing which victimisations are acknowledged as international crimes and subjected to prosecution within the KRT. To do so, it highlights the limits that have been placed on the Court’s temporal and personal jurisdiction, the political contexts behind those limitations, and how prosecutorial discretion has further shaped the selective justice offered by the Tribunal. Section three then turns to the visibility of victims within the courtroom. The Court’s creation of a civil party system gives victims the opportunity to participate in its work as parties with similar rights to the prosecution and defence. Thus, the question of who is recognised as a victim takes on significant practical relevance, as recognition may entitle individuals to a number of procedural and substantive rights. The analysis adopts a critical victimological lens throughout, while also drawing from broader transitional justice and socio-legal literature to enhance its analysis. It also draws from interviews conducted in Cambodia in 2013 and 2014 with court practitioners (18) and civil society actors (7), who were asked to reflect on the mandate and practice of the Tribunal, as well as the role of victims within it. Through this analysis, it seeks to expose how heterogeneous actors pursuing a variety of not necessarily aligned goals, have contributed to a layered process of selectivity, which each layer shaping the pyramid of victims who are able to access recognition and redress, and determining the victimisations we ‘see’ as opposed to that which we do not ‘see’ (Mawby and Walklate, 1994: 19).

2007/KRT/TC, 14 March 2013; Case 002, Termination of the Proceedings Against the Accused IENG Thirith, 002/19-09-2007/KRT/TC, 27 August 2015.

⁵ Case 002/01, Trial Judgement, 002/19-09-2007/KRT/TC, 7 August 2014; Case 002/01, Appeal Judgment, 002/19-09-2007/KRT/SC, 23 November 2016.

⁶ See Letter from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the General Assembly, UN Doc. A/52/1007, 31 July 1998.

2. Selective Justice and the Construction of Victimhood

Critical victimology acknowledges criminal law as something created and enforced on the basis of social convention and political considerations (Doak, 2008). Thus, while most of us will suffer harm of some kind throughout our life, only some of these harms will be defined as criminal (Hillyard et al, 2004), and only some of those who perpetrated criminal acts will find themselves prosecuted. While selective enforcement of law and prosecutorial discretion is established in many legal systems, issues arise when the selectivity is arbitrary or discriminatory (Gelsthorpe and Padfield, 2003: 5). From a victim-centric perspective, selective enforcement renders certain harms unrecognised and without redress (Cryer, 2005: 193).

This critique of selectivity in criminal law is mirrored within the transitional justice literature (Cryer, 2005; Damaska, 2008; McCormack, 1997, Simpson, 1997). As McCormack (1997, 683) has noted, selectivity can be ‘found in relation to the acts the international community is prepared to characterise as “war crimes”, and secondly, in relation to the particular alleged atrocities the international community is prepared to collectively prosecute.’ Such critiques are linked to the concept of victors’ justice, and the argument that only ‘weak states’ or the losers of a conflict will find themselves subjected to prosecution (Damaska, 2008, 361). While noting that the very definitions given to international crime naturally already exclude a multitude of grave harms (e.g. harm caused by financial crises or poverty) (Kendall and Nouwen, 2013: 242) this section focuses on McCormack’s definition of selectivity as limiting the acts that will be identified as falling within the definitions of international crimes, and the acts that will then be prosecuted. In doing so, it considers how the pyramid of victims has been shaped first by the limitations placed on the KRT’s jurisdiction, and then by prosecutorial decisions around which suspects and crimes to prosecute.

The Politics of Victim Recognition

The Khmer Rouge era in Cambodia perpetrated harm against millions of individuals, through a range of criminal acts. However, the years leading up to the Khmer Rouge regime also saw civilians suffer the brunt of armed struggle between a repressive monarchy and communist insurgents (Form, 2009), a four-year US bombing campaign (Kissinger, 1979; Owen and Kiernan, 2006), and the authoritarian violence of a US-backed right-wing military government (Chandler, 1991). While Vietnam’s toppling of the Khmer Rouge in 1979 may have ended one violent regime, it was not until the 1990s that a tentative peace returned to Cambodia (Ciorciari and Heindel, 2014). This is in part attributable to the Cold War politics which saw the Khmer Rouge recognised as the legitimate government of Cambodia long after their defeat, while aid flowed in from states fearing a Vietnamese expansion (Fawthrop and Jarvis, 2005; Kunst, 2013). Thus, there has been a continuation of harm which cannot be attributed to the Khmer Rouge alone. Yet, while other acts of violence perpetrated against Cambodians arguably fall within the parameters of ICL (Owen and Kiernan, 2006; Fawthrop and Jarvis, 2005), they are not captured by the jurisdiction of the KRT, nor has legal accountability been pursued through other means.

This selectivity can in part be attributed to political interests. Although the new government prosecuted two Khmer Rouge leaders in the immediate aftermath of the regime (Gottesman, 2003), domestic policies developed to focus on encouraging the defection of Khmer Rouge cadres through amnesties, and reconciliation through ‘burying the past’ (Linton, 2004). Internationally, Cold War considerations prevented most states from engaging with Cambodia’s violent past for many years (Fawthrop and Jarvis, 2005). With the thawing of the Cold War came new political agendas, and an increased international wish to hold the Khmer Rouge accountable. Domestically, trials were viewed by the newly formed government as a means of gaining foreign credibility, and threatening remaining Khmer Rouge into defecting (Ratner, 2007: 215; Strangio, 2014: 241). Yet a desire to limit the extent of this accountability was evident from early in this process. The initial idea of a truth commission received little support internationally or domestically, arguably due to fears about whether too much ‘truth’ might be revealed (Klosterman, 1998). A limited number of prosecutions suggested a means of both delimiting accountability and creating a politically acceptable narrative (Ciorciari and Heindel, 2014: 20-21), and negotiations commenced between the UN and the RGC in 1997, eventually culminating in the KRT.⁷

The Tribunal’s mandate is specifically limited to trying senior leaders of the Khmer Rouge and those most responsible for domestic and international crimes committed during the period from 17 April 1975 to 6 January 1979.⁸ By restricting the time frame, and referencing the Khmer Rouge specifically, the drafters of the KRT’s Law made a clear statement as to which

⁷ Agreement between the UN and the Royal Government of Cambodia concerning the prosecution under Cambodian law of crimes committed during the period of Democratic Kampuchea, 6 June 2003.

⁸ Law on the Establishment of Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia for the Prosecution of Crimes Committed during the Period of Democratic Kampuchea, Law NS/RKM/0801/12, 10 August 2001

victimisations would have their harm recognised through criminal proceedings. Despite the various harms perpetrated against the Cambodian population, these jurisdictional limits exclude atrocities perpetrated before and after the regime, as well as crimes perpetrated by foreign actors (Bates, 2007). Such a selective response to atrocity is in part a pragmatic move to avoid overburdening an institution with unmanageable caseloads (White, 2017: 138). However, in the case of the KRT it is also in part reflective of the agenda of political elites: for the RGC, the limited jurisdiction prevented a focus on crimes committed by those who overthrew the Khmer Rouge regime or during the war that followed (Heder, 2011), while the US, who played a significant role in the KRT negotiations, avoided attention being drawn to their bombing campaign and support for the military government (Strangio, 2014: 243). Such jurisdictional restrictions reflect McCormack's first element of selectivity: the limiting of acts identified as international crimes. Indeed, they have been cited by members of the KRT's defence teams as impacting on the overall legitimacy of the process:

*The legitimacy of this tribunal can be questioned, first of all because of the temporal jurisdiction; nothing before 1975 or after 79 is subject of any debate, where it is obvious that crimes against humanity were committed.*⁹

Mawby and Walklate's (1994) seminal work in critical victimology places state actors in a central role in contributing to the victims who are seen compared to those who are not, while subsequent critical work has continued to highlight the role of political motivations in what is deemed criminal (Doak, 2008: 23). Within transitional justice, critiques that international courts provide selective justice and are influenced by political considerations are not unique to the KRT, but are made throughout criminal courtrooms and the literature (Meernick, 2003; Cryer 2005; Schabas, 2009-2010; Kramer and Killeen, 2012). Indeed, 'each war crimes trial is an exercise in partial justice to the extent that it reminds that the majority of war crimes go unpunished' (Simpson, 1997). Yet such critiques are worth reiterating. While the focus is often on the implications of selectivity for the legitimacy of the ICL project (Cryer, 2005; Brownlie, 2003; Wilkins, 2001, Damaska, 2008), such limitations also have very real implications for those most affected by mass atrocity: the victims themselves. In Cambodia, this has been demonstrated through many years of impunity, through the explicit rejection of a truth recovery mechanism, and through the exclusion of judicial consideration of the harms perpetrated by foreign actors, by lower-level cadres, or pre-1975 and post-1979.

⁹ Interview with Lawyer (Defence) 8 November 2013. See also Closing Statement of Co-Defence Counsel, Koppe, Trial Transcript Day 224, 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/TC, 31 October 2014, at 45.

Prosecutorial Selectivity and the Visibility of Harm

McCormack's second element of selectivity, relating to 'the particular alleged atrocities the international community is prepared to collectively prosecute', also has resonance within the KRT. As with many domestic criminal systems, international criminal prosecutors are not under an obligation to investigate or prosecute every allegation of crime which falls within their mandate. Such an approach would overburden and potentially paralyse institutions and the graver the crimes and higher the number of perpetrators and victims, the more selective they are expected to be (Jallow, 2005). This 'sordid paradox' (Aptel, 2012: 1360) has serious implications for the victimisations rendered visible by courts: prosecutions have significant weight in shaping accepted narratives of a conflict or regime, and thus determining which victims are acknowledged as worthy of redress, and which are 'symbolically rejected' (Aptel, 2012: 1372). However, despite the importance such decisions may have for victims, critical victimologists have noted that since the legal profession's 'theft of the conflict' from victims (Christie, 1977), victims' wishes are often considered a 'secondary topic' (Fattah, 1992, 198) in decisions around who and what to prosecute. In relation to who, there is a tendency within ICL to prioritise individuals who held positions of power (Damaska, 2008), while victims may also find their perpetrators excluded from prosecution due to political considerations (Gelsthorpe and Padfield, 2003: 5). In relation to what, prosecutors have normally focused on a few 'illustrative' or 'representative' events (Waldorf, 2011; Côte, 2005) due to factors such as jurisdictional limits, evidentiary sufficiency, resource constraints, legal principles, and the comparative gravity of different crimes (Jallow, 2005: 149-153). While such prosecutorial strategies may reflect legitimate concerns, they also reveal attitudes towards which harms should be condemned, and which victimisations should be included within the pyramid of victimhood.

In relation to who should be prosecuted, the influence of political considerations is highly visible within the KRT. During the Tribunals negotiations, while the UN negotiators had hoped for between 20 and 30 prosecutions, the RGC consistently argued that too wide a net would 'invite social unrest' (Ciorciari, 2009, 72). As part of the government's 'reconciliation' process had involved offering former cadres informal amnesties, the negotiators may have initially had legitimate concerns about a re-ignition of civil war (Ciorciari, 2009, 72). However, this position has also been described by interviewees as ‘designed to protect the present people in power’.¹⁰ Certainly, several members of Cambodia’s ruling party were Khmer Rouge cadres, and it is unlikely there was any wish to see liability stray too close to home (Strangio, 2014: 241). This perspective has arguably gained credence with the passage of time; while little evidence has emerged suggesting that prosecutions could cause social unrest, the RGC has continued to oppose any cases beyond Cases 001 and 002, resulting in tensions within and outside the KRT in relation to Cases 003 and 004.

These cases concern the actions of former Navy Commander MEAS Muth, and three former mid-level Khmer Rouge, Ao An, Yim Tith and Im Chaem (DeFalco, 2014). Although it is undisputed that all four were Khmer Rouge ‘officials’, and although researchers have linked them to the deaths of hundreds of thousands of people (Petit, 2010; Gillison, 2012), investigations in the two cases have been characterised by disagreements between national and international staff¹¹ as to whether the suspects should fall within the court’s personal jurisdiction of ‘senior leaders’ and ‘those most responsible’ (Kunst, 2013: 17). Outside the court, Hun Sen has publically stated that Case 002 should be the KRT’s last (Se, 2010), leading to speculation that the RGC is actively opposing subsequent cases from progressing (DeFalco, 2014). Although official charges were eventually made,¹² the case against Im Chaem was dismissed in February 2017, due to a finding that she was neither ‘a senior leader or one of those most responsible officials’ of the Khmer Rouge regime.¹³ This has led commentators to critique the KRT for its failure to acknowledge the role of politics, describing the dismissal as a ‘farce and pretence of justice’ (Wallace, 2017). Concerns that the remaining cases will never make it to trial were raised again in May 2017, when a leaked document revealed that the Co-Investigating Judges were considering a ‘permanent stay on proceedings’ due to ‘lack of funding’, and that such a move would be ‘prevent any re-opening of the investigations’.¹⁴ Funding has certainly been a consistent issue for the KRT, and one that has been interpreted ¹⁰ Interview with Lawyer (Defence) 8 November 2013.

¹¹ See e.g. ‘Press Release from the International Reserve Co-Investigating Judge’ (KRT Website, 19 March 2012) <www.eccc.gov.kh/en/articles/press-release-international-reserve-co-investigating-judge>

¹² ‘Mr Meas Muth charged in Case 003’ (KRT Website, 14 December 2015) <www.eccc.gov.kh/en/articles/mr-meas-muth-charged-case-003>; ‘The International Co-Investigating Judge charges Ao An in Case 004’ (KRT Website, 27 March 2015), <www.eccc.gov.kh/en/document/public-affair/international-co-investigating-judge-charges-ao-case-004>; ‘The International Co-Investigating Judge charges Im Chaem in absentia in Case 004’ (KRT Website, 3 March 2015) <www.eccc.gov.kh/en/document/public-affair/international-co-investigating-judge-charges-im-chaem-absentia-case-004-0>.

¹³ Although the case is confidential, a public summary of the decision is expected to be released.

¹⁴ ‘Staying Khmer Rouge tribunal cases mulled’ (Phnom Penh Post, 8 May 2017) <www.phnompenhpost.com/national/staying-khmer-rouge-tribunal-cases-mulled> by staff as a direct interference with Tribunals' ability to deliver on its mandate.¹⁵ As expressed by one interviewee 'if the judges are dependent, if their work is frustrated by just lack of funding, there is no independence, there is no continuity, it impacts on many principles.'¹⁶ However, some commentators have expressed scepticism that funding provides a full explanation for the Co-Investigating Judges' position.¹⁷ As a result of these prosecutorial choices and challenges, the KRT's recognition of the victimisations which occurred under the Khmer Rouge are currently limited to those captured by Cases 001 and 002.

While Case 002 would seem to offer broad recognition of harm, due to its focus on the policies of the Khmer Rouge, and crimes perpetrated across the country, limitations on victim visibility result from strategies around what crimes to prosecute. This manifests both in the focus on specific crime sites, and specific categories of crime. As has been in the case in previous tribunals (Waldorf, 2011;) investigations at the KRT have focused on a limited number of specific crime sites. By way of example, the Case 002 Closing Order acknowledges that by the end of the regime approximately 200 security centers and countless execution sites had been established throughout Cambodia, yet less than 10% are the focus of investigation.¹⁸ As noted above, such choices may reflect legitimate issues around evidentiary sufficiency and resource constraints. However, the use of representative sites may go against the wishes of victims, who may seek a more exhaustive form of accountability, and who may have no other official mechanism from which to seek recognition and redress (Aptel, 2012: 1367). This was evidenced during Case 002's investigations, when a number of ethnic Vietnamese civil party applicants expressed consternation on learning that investigations into crimes committed against their ethnic group were limited to certain geographical areas (Nguyen and Sperfeldt, 2014). In response, their lawyers requested additional investigations, noting that 'it is critically important to our clients' that additional sites be investigated.¹⁹ This request was rejected as being raised too late, and the applicants were initially excluded from participating as civil parties. As Nguyen and Sperfeldt (2014: 110) note, such exclusions demonstrate how prosecutorial selectivity can impact on the representativeness 'within and among the victim compositions participating in the judicial proceedings'. While the impact of this geographical ¹⁵ Interview with Judge 1, 7 November 2013.

¹⁶ Interview with Lawyer 1 (Chambers) 11 November 2013.

¹⁷ PP Post

¹⁸ Case 002, Closing Order, Co-Investigating Judges, Case No. 002/19-09-2007- ECCC-OCIJ, 15 September 2010, 48.

¹⁹ Civil Party Co-Lawyers, 'Civil Parties' Request for Supplementary Investigations Regarding Genocide of the Khmer Krom and the Vietnamese', Document D250/3, 3 December 2009.

selection has been mitigated to some extent by the broad definition given to civil parties (see below), decisions as to what categories of crime to prosecute have continued to have a significant impact on the visibility of victims at the KRT.

The visibility and prosecution of certain crimes over others has long featured in critical criminological and victimological analysis, which has sought to dissect why certain types of harm so frequently go unacknowledged and uncontrolled (Davies, Francis and Jupp, 1999, 2014). Although seeking to avoid a reduction of ‘oppression to patriarchy’ (Spencer and Walklate, 2016), critical victimology has drawn significantly from feminist scholarship in problematizing the persistent invisibility of SGBV (Mawby and Walklate, 1994:19). While feminist and critical interventions into ICL have succeeded in bringing about legal and policy developments enabling greater recognition of SGBV (Askin, 2003), efforts to acknowledge this type of harm continue to be critiqued as inconsistent and selective (Pritchett, 2008; SáCouto and Cleary, 2009). As has been the case in previous ICL courts (Askin, 2003; O’Rourke, 2013), the KRT has been criticised for its failure to adequately prosecute SGBV crimes (Williams and Palmer, 2015; Killean, 2015; Studzinsky 2011). This failure has been attributed to a number of interlinked factors, including the prevalence of a myth that the regime prohibited and punished SGBV (Savorn, 2011; Anderson, 2005), resource constraints leading to a focus on those crimes most easily proven (Ciorciari and Heindel, 2014: 100-101; Williams and Palmer, 2015), a lack of female interpreters, analysts and investigators (Poluda, 2015), a lack of sufficient training to enable effective and sensitive interviewing of victims (Killean, 2015), and a lack of awareness of the stigmatization that faced victims of SGBV (DeLangis and Studzinsky, 2012). As a result of these interlinked, Case 001’s indictment included only one incident of rape,²⁰ and the prosecutors’ initial submissions in Case 002 contained no reference to SGBV at all.²¹

This initial invisibility was contested by civil society actors, who published reports documenting multiple incidents of rape, forced nudity, sexual mutilation, abuse of pregnant women and forced marriage (e.g. Natale, 2011; Jacobsen, 2008; Nakagawa, 2008), hosted student forums and radio shows (Ye, 2011), and organised ‘women’s hearings’, at which victims of SGBV shared their experiences.²² This work challenged the KRT’s narrative of the past, and resonates with critical and feminist victimologies, which refute criminal law as the correct framework for identifying victimhood (Mawby and Walklate, 1994), and place victims' voices and experiences at the centre of their methodologies (McGarry and Walklate, 2015).

²⁰ Case 001, Decision on Parties’ Requests to Put Certain Matters before the Chamber Pursuant to Rule 87(2), 001/18-07-227/KRT/TC, 28 October 2009.

²¹ Case 002, Introductory Submission, Office of the Co-Prosecutor (confidential) 18 July 2007.

²² CDP, Reports on the 2011, 2012 and 2013 Proceedings of the Women’s Hearings on Sexual Violence Under the Khmer Rouge Regime, all available online at gbvkr.org/publications-and-materials/reports/

Within the KRT framework, victims and their advocates (Lilja, 2013) filed petitions and requested further investigations, with varied results.²³ In the context of forced marriage, civil party representatives successfully requested further investigations, leading to two charges being included in Case 002.²⁴ While this development has been applauded as a 'significant positive development' (Oosterveld, 2011), the KRT's legal framework has continued to act as a limitation on victims' ability to render themselves visible. Civil parties are unable to initiate investigations themselves,²⁵ and civil society organisations cannot compel the KRT to investigate specific crimes. This limitation was evidenced by the repeated exclusion of rape outside the context of forced marriage within Case 002, despite sustained advocacy.²⁶ Yet, investigations into SGBV both inside and outside forced marriage have been undertaken in Cases 003 and 004, with civil parties' evidence cited as a motivating factor.²⁷ This 'shift in attitude' (Palmer and Williams, 2017) demonstrates how engagement with diverse actors can combat 'elitist blind spots' (Rajagopal, 2002; Haslam, 2011; Haslam and Edmunds, 2013) and how victims and their advocates can contribute to the critical victimological goal of uncovering victimizations that may be rendered invisible due to the political climate, social factors, or the marginalised status of the victims (Holstein and Miller, 1990; McGarry and Walklate, 2015).

The importance of this engagement has also been demonstrated in the context of minority rights. Civil parties and their advocates have successfully contributed to the inclusion in Case 002 of allegations of genocide, deportation and other crimes specific to the treatment of the Vietnamese (Nguyen and Sperfeldt, 2014),²⁸ while the advocacy of the Khmer Krom ethnic minority group and their representatives has drawn attention to the crimes perpetrated against that group (Mohan, 2010). As the crimes committed against the Khmer Krom appear most ²³ Cited in Case 002, Forwarding Order to the Office of the Co-Prosecutors, 002/19-09-2007-KRT/OCIJ, 13 March 2009; Case 002, Closing Order, paras. 216 - 220.

²⁴ Case 002, Closing Order, at 1430, 1442.

²⁵ ECCC Internal Rules, Rule 49(1); Case 002, Order on the Admissibility of Civil Party Applicants from Current Residents of Svay Rieng Province, Case No. 002/19-09-2007- ECCC-OCIJ, 9 September 2010.

²⁶ Case 001, Decision on Parties' Requests to Put Certain Matters before the Chamber Pursuant to Rule 87(2), 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-TC, 28 October 2009; Case 002, Closing Order, at para 1426.

²⁷ ECCC Press Release, 'International Co-Prosecutor requests investigation of alleged sexual and gender-based violence in Case 004', 24 April 2014, www.eccc.gov.kh/en/articles/international-co-prosecutor-requests-investigation-alleged-sexual-and-gender-based-violence; 'International Co-Prosecutor Files Supplementary Submission in Case 003' ECCC Website, 4 November 2014, www.eccc.gov.kh/en/articles/international-co-prosecutor-files-supplementary-submission-case-003.

²⁸ Case 002, Closing Order, at 778-814.

prominently within Case 004, that case's uncertain future risks excluding their harm from the KRT's jurisprudence. Indeed, as explored by Mohan (2010), much experienced by this group remains underexposed. It may be that the difficulties these groups have faced in comparison to the relative success of SGBV advocacy is in part reflective in part of international funding priorities. There is undoubtedly a current momentum behind initiatives address conflict-related SGBV,²⁹ as noted by a former civil party lawyer:

*When you combine the words transitional justice and SGBV, doors are opened, funding is there from the UN, from everybody. These are the key words and it is a little bit unfortunate for victims of other harms.*³⁰

In contrast, staff from a minority rights NGOs spoke of difficulties in obtaining funding, and of trying to advocate on behalf of minorities who continue to face discrimination within Cambodia.³¹ Thus, the popularity of the cause may also impact on the ability of victims and civil society actors to raise awareness of overlooked crimes, impacting on the visibility of such harms within transitional justice narratives.

3. Judicial Selectivity and the Civil Party System

The analysis thus far has focused on the processes of selectivity which have shaped the victimisations that are rendered visible through their prosecution as crimes. This section moves to consider the role of the judiciary in determining which victims are able to have their victimhood acknowledged through civil party participation. The KRT features a unique civil party participation system, which in theory allows victims' rights similar to the prosecution and defence. Its introduction was heralded as a 'historical achievement in international criminal law' as victims would be 'fully involved in proceedings at the ECCC'.³² However, an analysis of which victims are 'fully involved' reveals that even those victims whose harms are included within indictments will find their visibility shaped by professional elites and legal frameworks. As a result, recognition of victimhood continues to be dependent on both the victims' own characteristics, and the reactions of others (McAlinden, 2014).

²⁹ See e.g. UN Security Council Resolutions 1325 (2000); 1820 (2008); 1888 (2009); 1889 (2009); 1960 (2010); 2106 (2013); 2122 (2013); CEDAW General Recommendation No. 30 on Women in Conflict Prevention, Conflict and Post-Conflict Situations, UN Doc. CEDAW/C/GC/30, 18 October 2013.

³⁰ Interview with Lawyer (Former CP Team member), 11 September 2015.

³¹ Interview with Legal Assistant (CP Team), 10 December 2013.

³² 'Historic Achievement in International Criminal Law: Victims of Khmer Rouge Crimes Fully Involved in Proceedings of the ECCC' Statement by the Victims Unit, ECCC Website, 4 February 2008, <www.eccc.gov.kh/sites/default/files/media/Victim_Unit_Press_Release.pdf>

In analysing victim visibility through participation, this section focuses particularly on the Tribunal's judiciary. Civil party participation is not contained in either of the Court's founding documents. Instead, the civil party system's creation is a result of judicial policy-making (Rasmussen, 1986). This section therefore focuses on the role of judges in both creating and subsequently implementing civil party participation, drawing on theories of judicial behaviour to do so. While judicial behaviour within domestic contexts has been subjected to significant analysis, the role of ICL judges has received relatively little scholarly attention (exceptions include Jodoin, 2010; Wessel, 2006). Yet judicial discretion can be used to further a variety of political and legal agendas, with the developing nature of ICL arguably granting even greater space for judicial discretion and innovation (Jodoin, 2010). Dominant models of judicial behaviour include the strategic model, which perceives judges as motivated by specific political and legal goals (Epstein and Knight, 2000), and the attitudinal model, which views the ideas, attitudes and values of judges as key influencing factors (Tarr, 2003). While these models consider judicial motivations, Baum's (1995) hierarchal model notes that judges will also be constrained by legal rules, other participants, and their own political environments. Rather than committing to one specific model, I would argue that these factors are interlinked, and that consideration of the goals, attitudes and constraints that arguably shaped the KRT judiciary's attitude to victim participation assists in an analysis of the role legal elites play in shaping victim visibility.

In keeping with Baum's hierarchal model, it is arguable that the judges' initial decision to create a civil party system was influenced in part by their legal environment. Concerns around the appropriateness of using Cambodia's domestic criminal procedures led the judges to broadly interpret their right to seek guidance from international procedure, and draft their own Internal Rules (Acquaviva, 2008: 129). In doing so, they would have observed the growing international recognition of victims' rights, as evidenced by the ICC's Rome Statute and numerous international human rights declarations. Indeed, their drafting was accompanied by intense lobbying from victims' advocates, experts and NGOs, who cited such developments and promoted the creation of an expansive victim participation system (Saliba, 2009a). Wessel (2006) has noted that the role of a 'humanitarian technocrat' is often placed on international judges, who are encouraged to adopt professional customs and ethics which further humanitarian goals. Awareness of such expectations, when combined with the victim-centric developments in ICL, may have influenced the judges' approach.

Reflecting Tarr's attitudinal model, it has also been suggested that the judges' personal attitudes towards victim participation, as informed by their own domestic legal backgrounds, shaped their approach. Reportedly, most common-law judges favoured a lesser form of participation, while the French judge and his legal officer pressed for a French/Cambodian styled model, and the national judges favoured the scheme as a way of incorporating Cambodian law (Ciorciari and Heindel, 2014: 204). The result was the creation of a system which drew from, but also differed from the Cambodian model (Boyle, 2006: 310) and which originally provided for some of the most expansive victims' rights granted by an ICL court (Mohan, 2009). However, the judges' determination that their Rules constitute the 'primary instrument... in determining procedures'³³ and can be amended by the judges themselves, has allowed changing judicial strategies and attitudes to exert significant influence over who can be considered a victim entitled to participate as a civil party.

Recognizing Victimhood

Judicial attitudes towards who should be admitted as a civil party have differed as the KRT has proceeded with Cases 001 and 002. The Rules initially required applicants to demonstrate that they were 'victims of a crime coming within the jurisdiction of the KRT, and that their injury was 'physical, material or psychological' and 'the direct consequence of the offence, personal and have actually come into being.'³⁴ Thus, applications could be submitted in relation to any crimes that fell under the Court's jurisdiction.³⁵ Applications were also allowed from indirect victims, and in certain cases the successors of a deceased applicant.³⁶ However, in 2010 the judges amended the Rules, requiring applicants to 'demonstrate as a direct consequence of at least one of the crimes alleged against the Charged Person, that he or she has in fact suffered physical, material or psychological injury'.³⁷ This amendment followed an announcement on the scope of Case 002, and with Case 002 encompassing complex crimes and multiple defendants, the judges were undoubtedly aware of the impact incorporating large numbers of victims might have on trial expediency (McGonigle Leyh, 2011). It is therefore arguable that the amendment was an attempt to limit applications to victims connected to Case 002's specific ³³ Case 002, Decision on Nuon Chea's Appeal against Order Refusing Request for Annulment, 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/OCIJ, 26 August 2008. Emphasis added.

³⁴ Internal Rules, Revision 3, 6 March 2009, Rule 23(2)

³⁵ KRT Law, Arts. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8.

³⁶ Case 001, Trial Judgment.

³⁷ Internal Rules, Revision 5, 9 February 2010.

crimes and sites (Studzinsky, 2011), furthering a strategy of trial expediency, rather than victim inclusion.

The changes were made a few months before the Case 001 judgment, and after the deadline for Case 002 applications. However, they were retrospectively applied, contributing to 23 civil party applicants having their status revoked in the Case 001 trial judgment.³⁸ The applicants had participated throughout the trial, and had not been informed that their status was provisional. The decision caused extreme distress (Ciorciari and Heindel, 2014: 62); with the applicants perceiving the revocation of civil party status as a rejection of their experiences of harm (O'Toole, 2010). While the status of ten individuals was restored on appeal,³⁹ these strong reactions demonstrate the potentially harmful processes of exclusion that can result from linking victim recognition to legal institutions. The decision has since been critiqued by other judges as 'insensitive', and of being a reaction to the 'obscure' nature of the legal framework.⁴⁰ Certainly, the civil party system's unique and 'experimental' nature limited the external guidance available to judges,⁴¹ which may also have influenced the changeable nature of its implementation.

The issue of civil party eligibility also proved divisive in Case 002. Applicants were initially required to show 'personal'⁴² harm which resulted from material facts for which a judicial investigation had been opened.⁴³ This excluded applicants who had suffered from identical conduct at geographical sites not included within investigations. Of the 3,970 applications considered, 2,123 were admitted, and of the rejected applicants, 1,747 appealed.⁴⁴ The appeal decision revealed significantly different judicial attitudes, as the majority admitted applicants who claimed harm related to crimes alleged against the accused in locations excluded from investigations.⁴⁵ The majority further found that Cambodia's social and cultural context during the regime required a broader consideration of victimization, allowing for injury to be caused through the death of members of the appellant's community, through the witnessing of direct victimization, through the knowledge of a direct victims' fate, and through the fear of a similar

³⁸ Case 001, Trial Judgment, paras. 647 – 649.

³⁹ Case 001, Appeal Judgement, at 252 – 280.

⁴⁰ Interview with Judge 1, 7 November 2013 and Judge 4, 13 January 2014.

⁴¹ Interview with Judge 1, 7 November 2013.

⁴² Case 002, Order on the Admissibility of Civil Party Applicants from Current Residents of Oddar Meanchey Province, 002/19-09-2007-KRT-OCIJ, 26 August 2010, at 13.

⁴³ Case 002, Closing Order, at 10 -12.

⁴⁴ Case 002, Decision on Appeals against Orders of the Co-Investigating Judges on the Admissibility of Civil Party Applications, 002/19-09-2007-ECCC-PTC, 24 June 2011.

⁴⁵ Ibid at 76 – 77.

fate that the policies instilled.⁴⁶ As a result, 1,728 appeals were granted, increasing the number of civil parties to 3,866.

In addition to highlighting the role legal institutions play in shaping victimhood through jurisdictional limits and substantive criteria (Robins, 2017; Kendall, 2015), these decisions demonstrate how victim recognition can fluctuate as a result of changing case law and judicial strategies (Kendall and Nouwen, 2013: 246). Interviews conducted with judges and judicial officers highlighted how divisive this issue had been. Reflecting the attitudinal model, interviewees appeared to be influenced by their own legal traditions, but also by their understandings of what the court's role should be in recognising and responding to victims. Thus, some interviewees from civil law backgrounds disagreed with the majority's expansive interpretation of victimization, which shifts away from civil law's required link with the specific crimes charged.⁴⁷ Indeed, French Judge Machi-Uhel issued a dissenting judgment, arguing that the inclusive approach would frustrate those who satisfied the original narrower criteria, while disappointing those who were admitted but did not subsequently see their specific harms reflected in the Court's work.⁴⁸ In contrast, those who supported the majority position spoke of the importance of acknowledging the nature of harm under the regime⁴⁹ and avoiding 'inappropriate re-victimization...by their exclusion'.⁵⁰

While exclusions arise whenever legal institutions are used as the basis for recognising victimhood (Mawby and Walklate, 1994), the grave harms which form the subject matter of ICL courts render such exclusions particularly emotionally charged (McEvoy and McConnachie, 2013), as illustrated by the distress expressed by rejected applicants. However, even a broad policy of recognition will exclude some. This reality is demonstrated by Case 002, which focuses on criminal policies which arguably harmed the entire Cambodian population. While the majority decision eliminated the distinction drawn between those who had been harmed in one location from those harmed in another, the policy of broad recognition did not dispel arbitrary distinctions. Instead, the distinction became between those with the means to apply for civil party status, and those without. This distinction reflects what Rombouts and Vandeginste (2003) term the 'public recognition selection process', in which

⁴⁶ Ibid at 83 – 92.

⁴⁷ Interview with Judge 4, 13 January 2014; Interview with Lawyer 2 (Chambers), 11 November 2013.

⁴⁸ Case 002, Decision on Appeals Against Orders of the Co-Investigating Judges on the Admissibility of Civil Party Applications, Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge Marchi-Uhel, 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/PTC, 24 June 2011.

⁴⁹ Interview with Judge 2, 11 November 2013.

⁵⁰ Interview with Judge 1, 7 November 2013.

only some have the ‘power’ to pursue recognition of their victimhood. Indeed, the argument has been made that justice is predominantly pursued by ‘urban elites and high-profile victims, who have a strong moral voice and an ability to clearly articulate demands’ but who may not be representative of all who have suffered harm (Van der Merwe, 2014: 200).

Access to assistance may also create distinctions. In addition to requiring the energy and time to engage with the Tribunal, which victims who are struggling to meet their basic needs may not have (Kendall and Nouwen, 2013), victims may face practical barriers, such as limited internet access or literacy skills,⁵¹ which make them dependent on outside assistance. Indeed 84% of civil party applications were submitted through intermediary NGOs (Sperfeldt, 2012). Such statistics evidence the arbitrary distinctions between recognised and unrecognised victimhood: while evidence suggests that nearly all Cambodians who lived through the regime consider themselves victims (Pham et al., 2011), only a small fraction can pursue recognition and redress at the KRT (Ciorciari and Heindel, 2014: 207). As Robins (2017: 54) has noted, ‘rights are mediated by the actors who articulate them’, and ‘become something that are largely claimed on behalf of victims rather than by victims themselves.’ The result is that victim recognition within a legal institution is often dependent on expert assistance, enhancing the control elites exercise over victim recognition, and potentially excluding those victims who may be unable to access assistance due to geographical isolation, structural inequalities, or social marginalisation (Van der Merwe, 2014).

4. Conclusion.

As Miers (1989) has noted, many groups and individuals can claim the label of ‘victim’, but the key questions for a critical victimologist are who has the power to apply the label and what considerations are significant in that determination. Drawing from this critical starting point, this article has made the argument that in the context of the KRT in Cambodia, as in other contexts (Mawby and Walklate, 1994), recognition of victimhood has been narrowed by a myriad of heterogeneous actors pursuing a variety of political, legal and social goals. Applying the critical victimological argument that terms such as ‘victim’ and ‘victimization’ are contested and open to manipulation (Dignan, 2005), it has explored how both the initial creation of the KRT and the way its practitioners have approached their work have excluded numerous individuals who have suffered harm from its remit, leaving many outside Kendall and Nouwen’s pyramid of victimhood.

⁵¹ ‘Cambodia Statistics’, World Bank Website, data.worldbank.org/country/Cambodia

To conclude, I would argue that there is a need within ICL scholarship and practice to greater acknowledge the role of actors and contexts in shaping responses to victimization. Such responses are sites of contestation (Haslam, 2007), in which the agendas of different transitional justice practitioners and other elites often play a significant role in demarcating the extent to which the real needs of victim populations in the aftermath of atrocity are addressed by transitional justice mechanisms. This can lead to restrictions being placed on the kind of victimisations which are rendered visible and worthy of redress, as evidenced by the compromises struck between the international community and RGC in creating and limiting the jurisdiction of the KRT. However, it can also lead to innovative processes which enhance victim visibility, for example through the creation of the civil party system and the work of civil society in expanding the Court's investigations and prosecutions to include greater acknowledgment of SGBV and crimes against minority groups. Acceptance of justice as a place of constraints and contest may contribute to greater honesty and humility in the discourse surrounding transitional justice (McEvoy, 2007). Such an increase in honesty and humility would provide welcome balance to the increased use of 'justice for victims' as legitimising rhetoric (McEvoy and McConnachie, 2013). By acknowledging the inherent limitations associated with using a criminal legal framework to define and recognise victimhood, trials can be more appropriately understood as one element of broader responses to grave victimisations. Unfortunately, when a small number of selective criminal trials form the only official response to atrocity, as has been the case in Cambodia, these layered processes of exclusion leave many harms invisible and many victims ultimately without redress.

References

- Acquaviva, Guido. (2008) “New Paths in International Criminal Justice? The Internal Rules of the Cambodian Extraordinary Chambers” Journal of International Criminal Justice 6(1): 129-151.
- Anderson, Katrina. (2005), “Turning Reconciliation on Its Head: Responding to Sexual Violence under the Khmer Rouge” Seattle Journal for Social Justice 3(2): 785 – 832.
- Aptel, Cécile. (2012) “Prosecutorial Discretion at the ICC and Victims’ Right to Remedy” Journal of International Criminal Justice 10: 1357-1375.
- Askin, Kelly D. (2003), “Prosecuting Wartime Rape and Other Gender-Related Crimes under International Law: Extraordinary Advances, Enduring Obstacles” Berkeley Journal of International Law 21(2): 288-349
- Bates, Alex. (2007) “Cambodia's Extraordinary Chamber: Is it the Most Effective and Appropriate Means of Addressing the Crimes of the Khmer Rouge?”. In Ralph Henham and Paul Behrens (eds.). The Criminal Law of Genocide: International, Comparative, and Contextual Aspects 185-197. London: Routledge.
- Baum, L., ‘Electing Judges’ in L Epstein (ed.) Contemplating Courts (SAGE, 1995).
- Bernath, Julie. (2015) “‘Complex Political Victims’ in the Aftermath of Mass Atrocity: Reflections on the Khmer Rouge Tribunal in Cambodia” International Journal of Transitional Justice 10(1) 46-66.
- Boyle, David. (2006), “The Rights of Victims: Participation, Representation, Protection, Reparation” Journal of International Criminal Justice 4(2) 307-313.
- Brownlie, Ian. (2003), Principles of International Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Carrabine, E., Inganski, P., Lee, M., Plummer, K., and South, N. (2004) Criminology: A Sociological Introduction, Abingdon: Routledge.
- Chandler, David. (1991) The Tragedy of Cambodian History. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Christie, Nils. (1977) “Conflict as Property” British Journal of Criminology 17(1): 1-15.
- Christie, Nils. (1986) “‘The ideal victim’”, in E. Fattah (ed.) From Crime Policy to Victim Policy, Basingstoke: Macmillan.

Ciorciari, John. (2009). "History and Politics Behind the Khmer Rouge Trials". In Ciorciari, John and Heindel, Anne, On Trial: The Khmer Rouge Accountability Process. Phnom Penh: DC-Cam.

Ciorciari, John and Anne Heindel (2014a) Hybrid Justice. Michigan: University of Michigan Press.

Côte, Luc. (2005) "Reflections on the Exercise of Prosecutorial Discretion in International Criminal Law" Journal of International Criminal Justice 3(1): 162-186.

Cryer, Robert. (2005) Prosecuting International Crimes: Selectivity and the International Criminal Law Regime. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Damaska, Mirjan R. (2008) "What is the Point of International Criminal Justice?" 83 Chicago-Kent Law Review 329

Davies, P, Francis, P, and Wyatt, T. (2014) Invisible Crimes and Social Harms, London: Palgrave Macmillan.

DeFalco, Randle. (2014) "Cases 003 and 004 at the Khmer Rouge Tribunal: The Definition of 'Most Responsible' Individuals According to International Criminal Law". Genocide Studies and Prevention: An International Journal 8(2): 45-65.

De Langis, Theresa and Silke Studzinsky. (2012) Briefing Paper on the ECCC, the Cambodian Women's Hearing, and Steps for Addressing Sexual Violence under the Khmer Rouge Regime, Phnom Penh: Cambodian Defenders Project.

Douglas, Mary. (1987) How Institutions Think, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd.

Doak, Jonathan. (2008) Victims' Rights, Human Rights and Criminal Justice: Reconceiving the Role of Third Parties. Oxford: Hart Publishing.

Epstein, L., and J. Knight, 'Towards a Strategic Revolution in Judicial Politics: A Look Back, A Look Head' 53(3) Political Research Quarterly (2000) 625

Fattah, Ezzat. (1992) Towards a Critical Victimology. London: Macmillan Press.

Fawthrop, Tom and Helen Jarvis. (2005) Getting Away With Genocide? London: Pluto Press.

Fletcher, Laurel. (2015) "Refracted Justice: The Imagined Victim and the International Criminal Court". In Christian De Vos, Sara Kendall and Carsten Stahn (eds.), Contested

Justice: the Politics and Practice of International Criminal Court Interventions, 302-326. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Geertz, Clifford. (1993) "Thick Descriptions: Toward an Interpretive Theory of Culture" in Geertz, Clifford (ed.), The Interpretation of Cultures: Selected Essays. London: Fontana Press.

Gelsthorpe, Loraine, and Padfield, Nicola. (2003) Exercising Discretion: Decision Making in the Criminal Justice System and Beyond. Portland: Willan.

Gillison, Douglas. (2012) "Crimes Scenes of the Khmer" The Investigative Fund.

Gottesman, Evan. (2003) Cambodia After the Khmer Rouge: Inside the Politics of Nation Building. Yale University Press.

Haslam, Emily (2007) 'Law, Civil Society and Contested Justice' in M. Dembour and T. Kelly, Paths to International Justice: Social and Legal Perspectives (Cambridge University Press,) 57-82

Haslam, Emily. (2011), "Subjects and Objects: International Criminal Law and the Institutionalization of Civil Society", International Journal of Transitional Justice, 5(2): 221-240

Haslam, Emily, and Rod Edmunds. (2013), "Victim Participation, Politics and the Construction of Victims at the International Criminal Court: Reflections on Proceedings in Banda and Jerbo" Melbourne Journal of International Law 14:727-747

Heder, Steve (2011). "A Review of the Negotiations Leading to the Establishment of the Personal Jurisdiction of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia", Cambodia Tribunal Monitor.

Hillyard, Paddy (ed). (2004). Beyond Criminology: Taking Harm Seriously. Pluto Press.

Hodžić, Refik (2010). "Living the Legacy of Mass Atrocities: Victims' Perspectives on War Crimes Trials". Journal of International Criminal Justice 8(1): 113-136.

Holstein, James and Gale Miller. (1990) "Rethinking Victimisation: An Interactionist Approach to Victimology" Symbolic Interaction 13(1): 103-122.

Jacobsen, Trudy. (2008), Lost Goddesses: The Denial of Female Power in Cambodian History, Singapore: NIAS Press.

Jallow, Hassan. (2005). "Prosecutorial Discretion and International Criminal Justice" Journal of International Criminal Justice 3: 145-161.

Jodoin, J. (2010), "Understanding the Behaviour of International Courts: An Examination of Decision-Making at the ad hoc International Criminal Tribunals" Journal of International Law and International Relations 6(1): 1.

Kauzlarich, David, Matthews, Rick and Miller, William. (2001) "Towards a Victimology of State Crime" Critical Criminology 10(3): 173-194.

Kendall, Sara and Nouwen, Sarah. (2013) "Representational Practices at the International Criminal Court: The Gap between Juridified and Abstract Victimhood" Law and Contemporary Problems 76: 235-262.

Kendall, Sara. (2015). "Beyond the Restorative Turn: The Limits of Legal Humanitarianism" in In Christian De Vos, Sara Kendall and Carsten Stahn (eds.), Contested Justice: the Politics and Practice of International Criminal Court Interventions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Killean, Rachel. (2015). "An Incomplete Narrative: Prosecuting Sexual Violence Crimes at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia" Journal of International Criminal Justice 331.

Killean, Rachel. (2016) "Procedural Justice in International Criminal Courts: Assessing Civil Parties' Perceptions of Justice at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia" International Criminal Law Review 16: 1-38.

Kissinger, Henry (1979). White House Years, Boston: Little Brown.

Klosterman, Theresa. (1998) "The Feasibility and Propriety of a Truth Commission in Cambodia: Too Little? Too Late?") Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law 15(3): 833-870.

Kramer, Amanda and Rachel Killean (2012) "Security Council Referrals to the ICC: A Politicised System" The Irish Yearbook of International Law 8: 117-146.

Kunst, Christine (2013). The Protection of Victims and Witnesses at International and Internationalized Criminal Courts – the Example of the ECCC. Nijmegen: Wolf Legal Publishers.

Kutnjak Ivković, Sandra and John Hagan. (2011) Reclaiming Justice: The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and Local Courts, Oxford University Press: Oxford.

Letschert, Rianne, Haveman, Roelof, De Brouwer, Anne-Marie and Pemberton, Antony (eds) (2011). Victimological Approaches to International Crimes: Africa. Cambridge: Intersentia.

Lilja, Mona. (2013), Resisting Gendered Norms: Civil Society, the Juridical and Political Space in Cambodia, Aldershot: Ashgate.

Madlingozi, T. (2007), 'Good Victims, Bad Victims: Apartheid's Beneficiaries, Victims and the Struggle for Social Justice', in W. Le Roux and L Van Maerle (eds), Memory and the Legacy of Apartheid (Pretoria: Pretoria University Press).

Madlingozi, T. (2010) "On Transitional Justice Entrepreneurs and the Production of Victims" 2 Journal of Human Rights Practice 208.

Mawby, Rob and Walklate, Sandra. (1994) Critical Victimology: International Perspectives, Sage: London.

McAlinden, Anne-Marie. (2014) "Deconstructing Victim and Offender Identities in Discourses on Child Sexual Abuse: Hierarchies, Blame and the Good/Evil Dialectic" British Journal of Criminology, 54(2): 180-98.

McCarthy, Conor. (2012) Reparations and Victim Support in the International Criminal Court. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press^[SEP]

McCormack, Timothy. (1996-1997) "Selective Reaction to Atrocity: War Crimes and the Development of International Criminal Law" Albany Law Review 60: 681-733.

McEvoy, K., 'Beyond Legalism: Towards a Thicker Understanding of Transitional Justice' 24 Journal of Law and Society (2007) 411

McEvoy, Kieran, and McConnachie, Kirsten (2012). "Victimology in Transitional Justice" Victimhood, Innocence and Hierarchy" European Journal of Criminology 9(5): 527-38.

McEvoy, Kieran and McConnachie, Kirsten. (2013) "Victims and Transitional Justice: Voice, Agency and Blame" Social and Legal Studies 22(4): 489-513.

McGarry, Ross, and Walklate, Sandra, (2015). Victims: Trauma, Testimony and Justice, London: Routledge.

McGonigle Leyh, Brianne. (2011), Procedural Justice? Victim Participation in International Criminal Proceedings, Leiden: Intersentia.

Meernick, James. (2003) "Victors' Justice or the Law? Judging and Punishing at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia" Journal of Conflict Resolution 47(2): 140-162.

Meyers, Diana. (2011) "Two Victim Paradigms and the Problem of 'Impure' Victims" Humanity: An International Journal of Human Rights, Humanitarianism, and Development 2(2) 255-275.

Mibenge, Chiseche Salome. (2013) Sex and International Tribunals, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press.

Miers, David. (1989) "Positivist Victimology: a Critique Part 1" International Review of Victimology 1: 3-22.

Moffet, Luke. (2014) Justice for Victims before the International Criminal Court. London: Routledge.

Moffett, Luke. (2017) "Reparations for Victims at the International Criminal Court: A New Way Forward?" International Journal of Human Rights, 1-19.

Mohan, G. (1999) "Not so Distant, Not so Strange: the Personal and the Political in Participatory Research" Ethics, Place and the Environment 41.

Mohan, M., 'The Paradox of Victim-Centrism: Victim Participation at the Khmer Rouge Tribunal' 9 International Criminal Law Review (2009) 733

Mohan, M. (2010) "Reconstituting the "Un-Person": The Khmer Krom and the Khmer Rouge Tribunal" Singapore Yearbook of International Law 12: 43

Nakagawa, Kasumi. (2008), Gender-Based Violence during the Khmer Rouge Regime: Stories of Survivors from the Democratic Kampuchea (1975-1979), Phnom Penh: Cambodian Defender Project.

Natale, Katrina. (2011), "'I Could Feel My Soul Flying Away From My Body' A Study on Gender-Based Violence During Democratic Kampuchea in Battambang and Svay Rieng Provinces", Phnom Penh: Cambodian Defenders Project.

Nguyen, Lyma; Sperfeldt, Christoph (2014). "Victim Participation and Minorities: Ethnic Vietnamese Civil Parties at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia" Macquarie Law Journal 14: 97.

Oosterveld, Valerie (2011). "Atrocity Crimes Litigation Year-in-Review (2010) A Gender Perspective" Northwestern Journal of International Human Rights 9(3): 325-355.

O'Rourke, Catherine. (2013), Gender Politics in Transitional Justice, London: Routledge.

O'Toole, James. (2010) 'Reparations remain a key issue' The Phnom Penh Post, 27 July 2010.

Owen, Taylor and Ben Kiernan. (2006) "Bombs over Cambodia". The Walrus Magazine, October: 62-69.

Palmer, Nicola. (2015) Courts in Conflict. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Palmer, Emma and Williams, Sarah. (2017). "A "shift in attitude"? Institutional change and sexual and gender-based crimes at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia". International Feminist Journal of Politics.

Petit, Robert. (2010) "Lawfare and International Tribunals: A Question of Definition? A Reaction on the Creation of the 'Khmer Rouge Tribunal'" Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 43: 189.

Pham, P., et al., After the First Trial: A Population-Based Survey on Knowledge and Perception of Justice and the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (Human Rights Center, Berkeley, 2011)

Poluda, Julian. (2015), Promoting Gender Equality and Improving Access to Justice for Female Survivors and Victims of Gender-Based Violence under the Khmer Rouge Regime: Final Evaluation Report, Phnom Penh: Cambodian Defenders Project.

Pritchett, SM, 'Entrenched Hegemony, Efficient Procedure, or Selective Justice?: An Inquiry into Charges for Gender-Based Violence at the International Criminal Court' [2008] Transnational Law and Contemporary Problems 265

Rajagopal, B, (2002) "International Law and Social Movements: Challenges of Theorizing Resistance" Colombia Journal of Transnational Law 396

Rasmussen, H. (1986), On Law and Policy in the European Court of Justice: A Comparative Study in Judicial Policymaking, Martinus Nijhoff.

Ratner, S. (2007). "Justice for the Khmer Rouge? Sir Ninian Stephen and the United Nations Group of Experts for Cambodia" in T. McCormack and C. Saunders (eds) Sir Ninian Stephen: A Tribute, Melbourne University Publishing.

Raub, Lindsey. (2008-2009) "Positioning Hybrid Tribunals in International Criminal Justice" New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 41: 1013-1053.

Robins, S. (2017) "Failing Victims? The Limits of Transitional Justice in Addressing the Needs of Victims of Violations" Human Rights and International Legal Discourse 9(1).

Rombouts, Heidy and Vandeginste, Stef. (2003) "Reparation for Victims of Gross and Systematic Human Rights Violations: The Notion of Victim". Third World Legal Studies 89: 114.

SáCouto, S and Cleary, K (2009). "The Importance of Effective Investigation of Sexual Violence and Gender-Based Crimes at the International Criminal Court" American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and the Law 33

Saliba, Michael. (2009a) "Civil Party Participation at ECCC: Overview" Cambodia Tribunal Monitor, 6 November 2009.

Saliba, Michael. (2009b) "Civil Parties Boycott Start of Character Witness Testimony while Experts Offer Psychological Assessment of Duch" Cambodia Tribunal Monitor, 31 August 2009.

Savorn, Duong. (2011) The Mystery of Sexual Violence under the Khmer Rouge Regime, Phnom Penh: Cambodian Defenders Project.

Schabas, William. (2009-2010) "Victor's Justice: Selecting 'Situations' at the International Criminal Court" The John Marshall Law Review 43: 535-552.

Se, Suy. (2010) "Cambodian PM Says No Third Khmer Rouge Trial" Agence France-Presse, 27 October 2010.

Simpson, Gerry. (1997), "War Crimes: A Critical Introduction". In Timothy McCormack and Gerry Simpson (eds), The Law of War Crimes: National and International Approaches, 1. The Hague: Kluwer.

- Spencer, Dale and Walklate, Sandra. (2016). Reconceptualizing Critical Victimology: Interventions and Possibilities. Lexington Books
- Sperfeldt, C., 'Cambodian Civil Society and the Khmer Rouge Tribunal' 6(1) International Journal of Transitional Justice (2012) 149
- Stover, Eric. (2005) The Witnesses: War Crimes and the Promise of Justice in The Hague University of Pennsylvania Press: Philadelphia.
- Strangio, Sebastian. (2014) Hun Sen's Cambodia, New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Studzinsky, Silke. (2011), "Victim's Participation before the ECCC" Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik, 997.
- Tarr, G.A. (2003) Judicial Process and Judicial Policy Making, Wadsworth,
- Tilly, C. (2008), Credit and Blame (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press).
- Trumbull, Charles (2008). "The Victims of Victim Participation in International Criminal Proceedings" Michigan Journal of International Law 29, 777-826.
- H. van der Merwe, 'Reparations through different lenses: The culture, rights and politics of healing and empowerment after mass atrocities' in J. Wemmers (ed) Reparation for Victims of Crimes against Humanity (London: Routledge, 2014)
- Van Wijk, Joris. (2013) "Who is the 'little old lady' of International Crimes? Nils Christie's Concept of the Ideal Victim Reinterpreted" International Review of Victimology, 19(2).
- Vasiliev, Sergey. (2009) "Article 68(3) and the Personal Interests of Victims in the Emerging Practice of the ICC". In Carsten Stahn and Göran Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court, 635-691. Martinus Nijhoff: Leiden.
- Waldorf, L. (2011) "A Mere Pretense of Justice: Complementarity, Sham Trials and Victor's Justice at the Rwanda Tribunal", Fordham International Law Journal 33:1220
- Wallace, Julia (2017). "The Bucolic Life of a Cambodian Grandmother Accused of Mass Killings", New York Times, 24 February 2017.
- Walklate, Sandra. (2011). "Reframing Criminal Victimization: Finding a Place for Vulnerability and Resilience" Theoretical Criminology 15(2): 179-94.

Wessel, J. (2006), "Judicial Policy-Making at the International Criminal Court: An Institutional Guide to Analyzing International Adjudication" Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 44: 377

White, C. (2017) Bridging Divides in Transitional Justice. Cambridge: Intersentia.

Wilkins, B. (2001) "Whose Trials? Whose Reconciliation?" in Aleksandr Jokic (ed) War Crimes and Collective Responsibility: A Reader, 85-96. Blackwell: Maiden MA.

Williams, Sarah and Palmer, Emma. (2015). "The Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia: Developing the Law on Sexual Violence?" International Criminal Law Review 15(3): 452-484

Ye, Beini. (2011), "Forced Marriages as Mirrors of Cambodia Conflict Transformation" Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice 23(4): 469-475

Zhang, Binxin. (2016). "Recognising the Limits of Victims Participation: A Comparative Examination of the Victim Participation Schemes at the ECCC and ICC". In Simon Meisenberg and Ignaz Stegmiller (eds), The Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia: Assessing their Contribution to International Criminal Law, 515-535. Berlin: Asser Press.